E, the second vowel, and fifth letter in the alphabet, receives its origin from the Hebrew ה, to which it answers in alphabetical order, and from which also it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right, to comply with our way of writing, it stands thus ה; and by taking the separate perpending line, and joining it transverse to the foot, that it may answer the top line, we easily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. Є, which our Saxon ancestors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and short in the old Greek, as it is still in most languages, who pronounce λέγω, and λήγω, though of a quite different sense, and innumerable such words, after the same manner; from which ambiguity often ariseth. To obviate this, and perhaps some other inconveniencies, they invented H to express the long sound, or, to speak more properly, they robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but sixteen, and supplied the want of it by a mark of aspiration, writing ἔθμὸς for ΗΕΤΗΜΟΣ. But this only could supply the want of their banished H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themselves under a necessity of inventing three letters more to express it in the middle, namely, Θ, X, Φ. But of this see more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Geek was pronounced like ει, as ο was sounded like ȣ. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourse with, all its sister vowels, and they likewise with it; e. g. into a, as from fero comes latus, from reor, ratus; so also in like manner a is changed into e, as from tracto comes detrecto; e into i, as from emo comes eximo and perimo; and in like manner i into e, as for instance eligans, which was written by the ancients for elegans, as Gellius informs us, 11, 2; and in some words these vowels are used indiscriminately, as heri or here. Augustus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Instit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as sibe and quase for sibi and quasi. Thus also upon a supposition that this way of writing came nearest to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; whence the Romans in the three like cases of the plural number of the third declension, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in es, is, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accusative and ablative sing. of the same declension, in many words these terminations are indifferently used, as might be shown by innumerable examples. That e and o also are thus interchangeably used, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in the Greek words λέγω, λόγ☉, τρέπω, τρόπ☉; and so also o into e, as from vos comes vester; to omit that vostrum and vestrum, advorsum and adversum are read in pure writers. Lastly, the same is likewise to be observed with respect to e and u, u and e, as for instance, in percello, perculi, perculsum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the composition of dipthongs, e is a prepositive only in two words, namely, heu in heu; but is subjunctive after innumerable words in a, as aedes, aeger, &c. It is subjunctive also after o in words derived from the Greek diphthong οι, as for instance in οἶστρ☉, which makes oestras, Οἰδίπυς, Oedipus. A.

F f Roman, and now in common uſe, F f Ital. which alſo is in modern uſe, 𝔉 𝔣 in old Engliſh, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern uſe, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the ſixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may ſeem to have loſt its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now uſed; but however its place is ſupplied in the numerals by ϛ, which is called Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, and its power of being a vowel, conſonant, and quieſcent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is ſtill otherwiſe made up. This ſixth Cadmean letter anſwering to ו was firſt turned to the left, as its original, thus, ꟻ, and afterwards to the right F. The Æolians uſed the former way, and turned it upſide down, thus, Ⅎ. Theſe people uſed it before ſoft vowels, writing Ⅎοῖνος for οἶνος; for an aſpirate, as, Ⅎολος for ὅλος; alſo in the middle of words to ſtop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their colliſion, as οϝις for ὄϊς. The old Latins alſo received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and ſetting it upright as we now uſe it. They, as well as the Æolians, uſed it for h, both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum for hordeum, veſo for veho; and ſometimes turned it into v, inſtead of οϝις, writing ovis, thereby ſhowing its affininity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the ſupineneſs, or ignorance, of Grammarians, was, and ſo continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, that there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into diſuſe among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they clipped upon words which anciently had begun with the letter h, or its ſubſtitute Ⅎ, and the other half upon ſuch as begin with a ſoft vowel. The Latins alſo, both in the beginning and middle of words aſpirated, reſumed the old letter h, inſtead of foſtis writing hoſtis, and inſtead of trafo, traho. But though its place and analogous uſe, favour its deſcent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be ſaid for its pedigree from the Hebrew פ, and ſo make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure, it may be as well formed from ו, turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final ף by turning it, and joining to the middle a ſmall line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ, by taking its ſhort leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the ſound and power of this letter, we cannot but obſerve that it comes nearer to the ſound of פ phe, and φ phi, than ve and vi, as our Weſtern people ſound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, פ is more generally changed into f than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרא comes the Greek φὴρ, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But ſince from what hath been ſaid may be gathered its relation to ו in place, and primitive uſe, and perhaps in its figure, but that in ſound at leaſt it ſeems more nearly related to the Hebrew פ or the Greek Φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reaſon may be given for ſuch a concluſion, why the ancient Greeks ſo early diſmiſſed this letter: namely, becauſe having otherwiſe ſupplied the uſes it had from the primitive ו, finding its ſound nearly related to their Φ, they concluded they had no further occaſion for it, and ſo left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever ſome great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the firſt rank alſo. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for ſo by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this cuſtom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itſelf, nor in the Hebrew or Greek tongues, who ſay not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticiſm, perverſeneſs, ignorance, or inadvertency, of Grammarians. And indeed, if this cuſtom would prove it a ſemivowel, we muſt alſo adopt s into the family of the liquids; and what is ſtill more abſurd, make a ſemivowel of two conſonants, whereof at leaſt they confeſs one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, juſt with as much reaſon as they call f, ef. Beſides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the ſame ſyllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and ſurely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a ſyllable. A.

G g Latin, 𝔊 𝔤 in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third Letter, was not in use amongst the Romans till about the second Punick war, being first introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the usurper c, and now settled by prescription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occasion, mutually serve each other. But though c may justly be called an usurper with respect to its order in the alphabet, we may allow it a kind of right, by having been invested with the power and sound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwise, after the admission of g, they would still have retained the pristine c in these and the like words. If any should ask how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into use, where and in what words to pronounce either sound? it must be answered, by use alone: For that this might be known so, may be exemplified by a hundred instances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loss how to sound that and 𝔱𝔥𝔞𝔱𝔠𝔥, 𝔱𝔥𝔢 and 𝔱𝔥𝔢𝔪𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔦𝔰𝔱𝔩𝔢, 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲 and 𝔱𝔥𝔬𝔲𝔰𝔞𝔫𝔡, 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔰 and 𝔱𝔥𝔲𝔪𝔟; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed must be owned, that to give several sounds to one and the same letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above instance, more difficult to be learned, and especially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans seem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverse; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more easy; we have laid aside þ and ð which we had, to make ours more difficult; which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, because of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately also from the same letter; others from the cognate ק, which, when turned to the right, C[much resembles G. I should think it more probably received its form immediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, since, as I before observed, the letter c originally had the power and sound of the after-invented g, as well as its own; and so when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reason differ no more from c in figure, than in sound. For indeed these letters differ only thus, c is a softer g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to pass, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a consonant changed into the softer c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reason jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenses, are read before the formative s, juncsi, recsi, tecsi, not jungsi, regsi, tegsi; for so, if we may believe Isidore, before the age of Augustus such words were usually written, not by x; which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian say, Instit. 1, 6. that the Romans might have been without it; as they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as in recs, apecs. The letter g sometimes also seems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is so close, that in some words either of them may be used; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigesimus, or vicesimus, from viginti; and they are often changed into each other: For as from viginti comes vicesimus; so from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the second rank of the mutes, is changed not only into x, but into χ alſo, as in the ſecond conjugation, which conſiſts of this order of the mutes, may plainly be obſerved; for example lego, f. lecs, p. lelecha; inſtead of legſo, lelegha, the harder ſound. I cannot forbear to obſerve here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, ſounding γένος and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in get and give, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great diſcouragement to thoſe who deſire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different ſound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almoſt as unintelligible as our Engliſh. H h, English black letter 𝔥 𝔥, English Saxon ƕ, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ח. The Phœnicians, most ancient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigean monument, having consulted to express the long sound of E, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἅμα, ὁδὸς, &c. instead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOΔOΣ; endeavouring, I say, for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writing Ἐνοδία and Ταὼς, for ENHOΔIA and TAHΩΣ; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously, for PHAMNOΣ, PHTΩP, ΠΥΡΡΗΟΣ, &c. writing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πύῤῥος, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but sounded after the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, was probably the reason why some of the ancient grammarians, and among the rest our great Master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it, is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would also recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer א and ח, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher ע and ח the parent of H, must be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristick of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must either be a vowel or a consonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But sure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes φ, ϑ, χ, which were not anciently in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother ח, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than a hard aspiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly substituted for it, as χάλω, halo, χάω, hio, χάμαι, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mihi, nihil; which also may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the second order of the mutes, which constitute their second conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the same termination; for as πλέκω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future sense; so dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tense. But others think it no letter, because the Latin poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves so much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpose: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much disregarded by the Latin poets; and especially the final s, which even before a consonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aspiration is frequently expressed in Latin by s, as ἧμι, semi, ἕξ, sex; and are these therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aspirate is set before all the vowels, as habeo, hebeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no consonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philosophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the same use had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. sepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; the two first whereof seem to have been so pronounced by some before, and in Cicero's time, as he expresly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and subjoining h to consonants and vowels was indeed used in pronunciation, but condemned by the best judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witnesseth, laughing Arrius to scorn, Ep. 82. for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinsidias. Cicero truly soon after, knowing very well that the ancients used not this aspirate insertion, for some time used to say pulcrior, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet seems afterwards to have espoused the aspirate way, at least in some words, as judging the sound more masculine and sprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himself, but more expresly from A. Gellius N. A. 2, 3. this custom was introduced. However, this way, though sparingly, and in few words used at first, grew into such a ridiculous excess, that some said chenturia, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Instit. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourse which h hath with the Æolic digamma, see the letter F. H. S. corruptly for L. L. S. a sesterce, being the fourth part of their denarius, viz. two pounds denoted by the L. L. and S. semis, a half, which in the first times of the Empire was worth two pence in our money. A.

I i, and in the black English letter 𝔍 i, in the Latin I i, in Greek with little variation Ι ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel having the smallest sound as well as figure, is most fitly suited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epist. 1, 109.

Nec mihi sunt vires inimicos pellere tectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel seven times, and the next smaller sound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the subject riseth, as in the sublime, the frequent use of it is to be avoided. For this reason Virgil has in the Æneid writ olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgicks. Hence also comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to strengthen the sound, as Jupiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other instances, which might be given out of the old manuscripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly show. This vowel in Latin compounds is also substituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The sound of this to the next small vowel e is so near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expressed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice versâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be observed; as in μίνθα, mentha, τέγγω, tingo. Add also, that in many words which are purely Latin these vowels are indifferently written, as magè and magìs, herè and herì; Magè pollens aër, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor est herè quàm fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accusative and ablative cases sing. of the third declension end in em or im, e or i. Also in our English tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the same kind. In making the Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is subjunctive to the rest, as aio, hei, hoi, hui, Ilythia. In numerals this, as being the smallest letter, is put for the smallest number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, set before the note of a larger number, subtracts itself, as IV. four, IX. nine.

J j English and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as well as the rest of their letters, a consonant, and hath a name as such, though in favour of pronunciation they sometimes use it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its consonant use, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the consonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and English, and by some in Hebrew words, like a soft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεῦ πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder sound; its true pronunciation being softer, and approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their 𝔧𝔞𝔥𝔯 and our year being sounded alike. The true sound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the same syllable, and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we say lé, cé, &c. A.

K k Roman, K k Italick, both which are used in the English and several European languages; 𝔎 𝔨 black letter English and German, pronounced alone kâ, but ought by analogy to be called ké, as bé, cé, dé, and the rest of the mute sisters; K κ Κάππα Greek, from the Chaldee כף כפא Kaph, signifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure resembles, the lower part whereof being elongated, makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek K, and by immunition, and bowing the right side, the small κ. The power of this letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κερκὶς, querqueda, dim. querquedula; κοινὸν, cœnum: and in like manner the Latin C is expressed by the Greek K; as, Claudius Cæsar, Κλαύδιος Καῖσαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only answers in sound to K, but also takes its figure from the same Hebrew letter: For as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as before shown; so C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the Western way of writing. Notwithstanding it appears that anciently K held its own place in many (especially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as κάλαβρα, kalabra, κοινισμὸς, kœnismus, Καρχηδὼν, Karthago, καλάνδαι kalendæ; yet these also are equally written by c, vid. Quint. Instit. 1, 7. K has likewise been continued in some words of Hebrew extraction; as, in Karissimus, which occurs in ancient monuments, from יקר; and in Kalumnia, from כלמה; K k, anciently a mark on the foreheads of those who were convicted of calumny. In our English tongue indeed, though disused in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but used even after c, to harden its sound; as in lick, and thick: but in words of Latin and Greek derivation may be spared; as in public, critic, hectic, &c. These words however coming to us in all probability through the medium of the French, it seemeth better to admit K. (A.)

L l Roman, L l Italick, 𝔏 𝔩 old English and German, which when pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, to it, in like manner as we also pronounce the other sister liquids el, em, en, er (corruptly ar) to distinguish them from the family of the mutes, whose sound we render articulate by postponing e, as bé, cé, dé, &c. In Hebrew this letter is called ל Lamedh, and among other significations denoteth a goad, or spit, which its figure resembles. In the Chaldean language it is stiled למדא Lamda, from whence comes the Greek Lambda, by inserting b; and by removing m from it, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Λ, by straightening one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the basis. It possesses the first place in the order of liquids, and is, as Plato in his Cratyl. has observed, the sweetest of them all, being suited to soft and easy descriptions; as, Molle meum levibus cor est violabile telis. It was usually sounded by the old Britons with a kind of aspiration, and was written in many words with ll, as it was afterwards with lh, as in llân, or lhân, a temple; llâu, or lhâu, a hand; which sound is made, by hissing l obliquely through the teeth, and aspirating it, though indeed it is best caught by the ear. Thus the most ancient Greeks sounded its sister P when initial, PH; as in PHOME, Roma; which in later times, after H was exterminated, being supplied by a note of aspiration prefixed, though pronounced after it was written as it is now, Ῥώμη; and this aspiration is still preserved in some Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhamnus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is subjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of syllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblandior; flo, confligo; gloria, conglobo; plango, compleo: and also to t, and th, in derivatives from the Greek, as in Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by the grammarians are called the immutables; as in fact they are in respect to the mutes, but not in regard to themselves, which is evident from Νύμφη, lympha; ager, agellus; λείριον, lilium, παῦρος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepositions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding some simple word beginning therewith, seems arbitrary; and we may write either conligo, or colligo; inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interligo, or intellego, &c. the former way of writing having obtained by ancient use; and as in the other letters, so even in these particularly; the latter method having only been introduced to soften the sound; as we see also in prepositions ending with mutes, prefixed to words and beginning with mutes or liquids, which for the same reason suffer the same, or greater, variations; as, for instance, absfero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adfero, affero; ebfero, effero; transno, trano, &c. In some few words indeed the liquid l may seem substituted for d; as in lacryma for δάκρυμα, in alacris for ἄδακρυς; but both these derivations may justly be suspected, unless confirmed by more unexceptionable instances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as it was anciently written by the Saxons, ⊏, making the curve angular, and analogical to V, five, as being half an X, that is, ten. A.
